The EagleEyes technology, developed at Boston College, permits individuals who cannot move their head or arms to manipulate a computer mouse through eye movement. EagleEyes technology, which has over 3.1 million users, gives a significant group of severely disabled individuals the ability to experience, for the first time, a level of autonomy and self-empowerment never before experienced. They now have the capacity to communicate, recreate, and learn in a formal way. This book tells the story of the development and progress that the EagleEyes application has made from the beginning. It covers several milestones including the development of an expanded collaboration between the innovative EagleEyes developers and the Boston College Campus School. It also details the development of an EagleEyes classroom with a strong educational rationale and a clear focus on teaching and learning with attention to active learner participation. Thirdly, it reports the specialized focus on the training of EagleEyes users and their assistants, including teachers, parents, speech and language pathologists, therapists and other health specialists. It includes testimonials from users, parents and other socially-conscious professional and non-educational practitioners.
