Shakespeare, Once a Printer and Bookman William Jaggard

The author, a descendant of the printer who produced Shakespeare's First Folio, examined the plays and poems of Shakespeare and found a sufficiently great preponderance of terms particular to printing and publishing as to lead him to believe that Shakespeare had actual working experience in a print shop, quite possibly that of the author's ancestor. The author's proposition is challenging and extremely well documented. Includes a master list of printing and publishing terms used by Shakespeare and the places and context in his works where they are used. ILLUS.
